UNIVERSITY COLLEGE LONDON – PHD RESEARCH

Mr. Poland started his PhD program in April 2009, will complete his research upgrade report and committee presentation in May 2011, and will then begin his field research and dissertation. The following is a summary of Mr. Poland's research topic:

The Problem: Research on American cities and urbanization has mostly focused on large cities and large metropolitan regions even though the majority of urban dwellers live in smaller cities and smaller metropolitan regions. In addition, urbanization in America is dominated by suburban spaces—more urban dwellers live in suburban spaces than in central cities. However, a review of research and literature on American urbanization reveals that there is a disconnect between the locations where urban research takes place (large cities and large urban regions) and where majority of Americas live (small urban regions and suburban spaces).

The process of suburbanization in America has created a multitude of new and remade spaces that are blurring of lines between what is urban space and what is suburban space. Much of the research on specific kinds of urban spaces often focus on spaces within the central city (i.e. gentrification or downtown redevelopment schemes) or in the newer suburban locations on the fringe of urbanized areas (i.e. edge cities and sprawl). Once again, this creates a void in research on spaces in-the-middle—older suburban spaces that have evolved over time. In addition, this gap in the literature on these in-the-middle spaces creates a gap in understanding the types of experiences that these spaces provide. So how do we understand this remaking of space and the kinds of (sub)urban spaces these are or the types of experiences they provide?

The Purpose: The aim of my research is to better understand the American urban experience as it is experienced by urban dwellers in smaller urban and smaller suburban spaces and how these smaller spaces provide authentic everyday-urban experiences. To accomplish this, I will utilize a case study approach to study West Hartford Center, a small suburban center in the small urban region of Hartford, Connecticut. The case study approach will allow me to study this space in great detail and to formulate a mean to best understand this kind of space and the urban experience that this space provides.

Research Questions: This fluid process of American (sub)urbanization has created a multitude of urban and suburban spaces that are changing and evolving. I argue that this evolution of spaces has created a remaking of some spaces into a new kind of (sub)urban space and that these spaces provide authentic everyday-urban experience. To demonstrate this I will answer the following questions:

1. What kind of (sub)urban space is West Hartford Center?
2. How and why did this (sub)urban space emerge?
3. Who were (and are) the change makers and what were their roles in the emergence of this new kind of space?
4. Who are the users of this (sub)urban space and how do they view and experience this space and what role does it play in their everyday lives?

To accomplish this, I intend to study the remaking of West Hartford Center over the past 30 years (1980 to 2010).
